Pete's Wardrobe

Assignment #6

Pete suffers from a common failing of many cats—curiously. There isn't anything missed by his curious nose and agile front paws. Indeed, although Pete was born a white kitty with a shiny pink nose, Pete continues to try on various colors.

Black or white? A strange smell could be detected from the box in the corner. Just what was in that mysterious package anyway? There had to be a way to find out. Using his best “door opening” skills, he finally managed to open the top of the box just enough to slide inside. It was hard to realize that the cat emerged from the box a short while later was actually Pete. This cat was mostly a dull gray color with several large black marks scattered along his body. The ashes from the fireplace provided a great way to camouflage his usual immaculate white self.

And then there was the day he decided to try a little green highlighting here and there. That wasn't too hard to accomplish. All he had to do was walk along the freshly painted shelves, roll on the floor in the paint spill, and then scratch himself behind the ears. But, it was a nice shade of green and only lasted six weeks.

Blue? O yes, that provides a nice change as well. The bucket contained the last of the water used to tie-dye socks, and of course this was something new to Pete. He really hadn't planned to go swimming, but when he finally managed to get his nose close enough to really smell the stuff inside the bucket, his back feet had slipped. When the bucket fell over, he tried to look innocent. Because he was the only one sporting blue socks, he didn't succeed. He gradually shed the blue socks, however, and was ready for whatever color arrived next!
